I should like to thank a great many people for making this thesis possible. My supervisor, Edward Tsang, has been a great source of advice and inspiration throughout the period of my study. In addition, Jim Doran provided many useful comments and views on my work at various stages. The members of my supervisory board, Sam Steel and Rachel Cardel-Oliver, were also very helpful and supportive throughout. Other members of the research staff at the University of Essex have also given me support. Many lively discussions were held with Andrew Davenport, Alvin Kwan and Patrick Mills. My thanks go to all of these.

Writing a thesis is not only about academic discussion and debate. Without sufficient motivation and support from other sources, it would not be possible. For that I am grateful to many of my friends and family, and in particular to Anneke and Thomas.
